LUNCH ATOP A SKYSCRAPER RCA Building, New York City • September 20, 1932

Eleven ironworkers take their lunch break on a Bethlehem Steel I-beam 850 feet above New York City's busy streets, seemingly without a care in the world. The men pictured here were believed to be some of the many first-generation immigrants constructing the majestic Midtown Manhattan skyline during a building boom driven by the demand for taller and taller skyscrapers. Three of the men have since been identified: Joseph Eckner, third from left; Joe Curtis, third from right; and Gustav Popovic, far right. In 1932, former daredevil and stuntman-turned-photographer Charles Clyde Ebbets was the photographic director of Rockefeller Center, responsible for publicizing the new skyscraper during its construction. Ebbets and fellow photographers Tom Kelley and William Leftwich collaborated on this whimsical photoshoot off the 69th floor of the building, now known as 30 Rock. First published in The New York Herald Tribune in October 1932, this iconic photograph continues to captivate viewers with its dizzying contrast of perilous heights and unflinching ease.
